

HISTORY OF THE SALT LAKE COUNTY RECORDER

(Includes information from the Utah State Archives)

The foundation of what was to become the recorder's office was laid in 1215 A.D. with the signing in medieval England of the Magna Charta that provided for state protection of land ownership. The practice of recording real estate documents developed in English law from that time and traveled to the New World with the colonists. Public land registrars were appointed in colonial America to keep accurate records. A system of registration was necessary to prove the rights of persons who first made claims to property.

In the Utah territory Brigham Young established a method for recording land records in "An Ordinance in Relation to County Recorders," approved 1 March 1850. A county recorder in each county was commissioned to record "all transfers or conveyances of land or tenements, and all other instruments of writing and documents suitable, necessary and proper" to such conveyances. In short, the recorder was to keep a record of every action or transaction that involved real property. Documents were to be recorded in "good and well bound books, suitable for the purpose." The books were to be indexed in alphabetical order and were to be free to examination. The government of the Territory of Utah created the office of the Salt Lake County Recorder in 1852.

The earliest Utah deeds were typically called transfers. The earliest county recorders' books contain copies of surveyors' certificates and transfers. As time passed, recorders added various types of deeds, patents, mining claims, etc., to create an ever-increasing variety of official land records.

The functions of the Salt Lake County Recorder continue to be fundamentally the same. Today, however, those functions are more specifically established by state statute. And, rather than being recorded in "good and well bound books", records are kept by various electronic means. All records in the Recorder's Office are public and are open to inspection during regular office hours.

The Recorder was originally elected to a four-year term. In 1886, the law was changed and the term was changed from four years to two years. In 1921, the law was changed again and the recorder was to be elected to a four-year term.
